Architect Drew Rogers completed a total overhaul of the practice facility at The Club at Mirasol in Palm Beach Gardens, Fla. It opened in October. The new range, putting greens and short-game area are thoroughly integrated into new traffic patterns serving the clubhouse and both 18-hole courses. Rogers, who collaborated with director of golf course maintenance Michael Thomas, took a two-tier green and made it single-tier, which increased square footage by 20 percent. He also added a second putting green to reduce stress and provide players more elbowroom. In the range area, Thomas accented the targets with faux bunkers and landforms, and fashioned target corridors by using two contrasting varieties of turf (TifGrand for target greens, TifSport for rough) that don't require differing mowing heights. Rogers also created a seamless flow of traffic, where players can park once and use the new range, short-game area and putting greens without getting back in the cart.
